A Note From the Executive Director . . .

One of the great things about an independent press is that it’s, well, independent. There are no star chambers or provosts or apparatchiks or page counters. At Etruscan, we’re as likely to sight a UFO as a CFO. Our 2016 titles certainly take liberties. David Lazar’s eerie and hilarious Who’s Afraid of Helen of Troy defies classification if not description—are they prose poems? Micro-fiction? Redactions of ancient comedy skits? And Meg Pokrass’ The Dog Looks Happy Upside Down is no less slippery; the flashiest of flash fiction. In A Heaven Wrought of Iron, David Spitzer channels his inner Homer and offers an original approach to epic poetry. What a delight to welcome these pyrotechnicians to our fireworks.

Our Fall season features three veteran, not to say venerable, Etruscans, each a past National Book Award nominee. William Heyen collects a half-century of meditation on the Holocaust in his biggest book yet, The Candle. Diane Raptosh follows the success of American Amnesiac with another energized and nuanced screed, Human Directional, and Tim Seibles’ One Turn Around the Sun presents a moving meditation on the passing of time.

2015 saw us named one of the top five presses in the country by AWP. There were awards from PEN and CLMP and an Ohio Governor’s Award in Arts Education. Our Outreach Program touched new readers in high schools, prisons, retirement homes and community centers. 2016 promises more unpredictable engagements. We pledge our unallegiance.

Who’s Afraid of Helen of Troy: An Essay on Love

Poetry

DAVID LAZAR
Available April 2016

In Who’s Afraid of Helen of Troy, David Lazar extends the language of prose poetry, mixing the classical and the high modern, the song and dance man and the Odyssean. Nothing, he finds, is as far apart as we think, except for chaos and order, innocence and experience. Lazar’s voice is a sacred last resort: something’s gotta give.

“In the wild ride that comprises Lazar’s lively, surreal prose poems, ancient scenes and myths mate with contemporary manners and slang. These are vibrant poems of love, romantic complication, manners and morals and ageless longing.”

--Amy Gerstler, author of Dearest Creature

David Lazar’s books include essays, prose poetry, nonfiction anthologies, and interview collections. Lazar lives in Chicago, Illinois.

The Dog Looks Happy Upside Down

Flash Fiction

MEG POKRASS
Available June 2016

This collection of tiny, intimate truffles is as powerful as soul-chocolate infused with caffeine. Each story contains bite-sized glimpses into the lives of everyday people, leaving readers with the long and lasting effects of a full-length novel. Each chapter dives into relevant life events that require further contemplation. These 50 stories reveal the dark truth and reality of the world.

Meg Pokrass gets a lot done in the shortest spaces imaginable, whole worlds in a handful of words, a teeming city of characters arising from mere paragraphs, Fifty stories that just won’t quit. With The Dog Looks Happy Upside Down, flash fiction comes of age.”

--Bill Roorbach, author of The Remedy for Love

Meg Pokrass is a leading American writer of the flash fiction form. She is the author of four previous flash fiction collections. Pokrass lives in San Francisco, California.

A Heaven Wrought of Iron: Poems from the Odyssey

Poetry
D. M. SPITZER
Available July 2016

D. M. Spitzer’s collection unfolds a poetic engagement with the Greek Odyssey within the framework of the ancient epic: 24 books and a well-known and complex narrative architecture. The poems contained in A Heaven Wrought of Iron inhabit a range of voices and perspectives drawn from both the world of Homer’s Odyssey and from that of the poet-as-reader.

“Spitzer’s voice is one that, like the center figure of nesting dolls, finds itself enclosed in larger voices—the air a voice, the sky a voice, and the heavens, too. It is and isn’t one’s own, such work, such poems, such making.” --Dan Beachy-Quick, author of Circle’s Apprentice

After pursuing graduate studies in political thought, philosophy, and classics, D. M. Spitzer completed a Master of Fine Arts in Writing at Vermont College of Fine Arts. Spitzer resides in Harrisburg, PA with his wife and their three children.

Human Directional

Poetry
DIANE RAPTOSH
Available September 2016

Human Directional angles with cautious hope toward “the space of the thinkable,” celebrating body/beauty, justice and decency, difference and community. With the deadly precision of the fey, Human Directional reveals the heartbreak and absurdity of our world by exploring—and often exploding—its most sacred memes.

“Human Directional is a clear indication of Raptosh’s infinite capacity to surprise. Subverting conventions and expectations, she plays with logic as gracefully as a rhythmic gymnast plays with a baton. She is at once a poet, a philosopher, and an entertainer. I come away seeing the world in an entirely new way.” --Nin Andrews, author of Why God Is a Woman

Diane Raptosh’s fourth book of poetry, American Amnesiac (Etruscan Press), was longlisted for the 2013 National Book Award. Raptosh teaches literature and creative writing at The College of Idaho. She lives with her family in Boise, Idaho.

The Candle: New and Selected Poems

Poetry
WILLIAM HEYEN
Available October 2016

_The Candle_ is the record, unlike any other in our literature, of an American poet’s staring into the central atrocities of our Twentieth Century, of his struggle against soul-sickness as he attempts, over almost 50 years, by way of despised and barbaric poetry (in Theodor Adorno’s terms), to find ways to realize (make real), to understand, to remember.

“No other American poet has thought more deeply about the Holocaust than William Heyen, and no other American poet has produced such a searing and distinguished body of Holocaust poems. This compelling collection, drawing together the work of 45 years, will be a tremendous resource for those of us who know his work well and a perfect way to introduce new generations of readers to the most devastating legacy of modern history.” -- Cary Nelson, editor of Anthology of Modern American Poetry (Oxford, 2014)

One Turn Around the Sun

Poetry
TIM SEIBLES
Available January 2017

_One Turn Around the Sun_ is a panorama of poems that attempt to define the twilight during which a person becomes caretaker of parents and begins to grind against that old saying, “Life is too short.” The book also studies the intricacies of being a self, a particular personality shaped by forces seen and unseen, both knowable and not. At times, the various voices might be considered characters that agree and sustain one perspective. In other cases, contending sensibilities imply an underlying argument.

This is especially true of the book within the book, which is entitled “The Hilt.”

This poetry collection is driven by several questions, the most central being how can a person stay sane when so often socio-political circumstances mock all efforts to create a livable world. This is a book intended to bolster an ongoing engagement with life at a time when running away is a great temptation.

Interview with Laurie Jean Cannady

by Sam Chiarelli

“It was an awakening for me,” Laurie Jean Cannady says, describing the process of writing her debut memoir, Crave: Sojourn of a Hungry Soul.

Cannady began writing as far back as she can remember. In her childhood, she wrote stories, poems, and plays. As an adult, she knew she would have to write a memoir.

“I was really called to writing because I thought of the young women and young men who grew up where I grew up, or who grew up in similar situations to the one that I grew up in,” Cannady says. “I just kept thinking that our voices need to be out there. They need to be heard. People need to understand what it’s like to live in a world where oftentimes you’re marginalized, and people will really negate your voice.”

Cannady’s lyrical voice is the one she uses in everyday speech. She says honing one’s voice is critical.

“I think it’s very important for writers to read aloud what they’ve written, and also get others to read it to them,” she says. “You hear where they pause and where they stop.”

Cannady believes that writing workshops and writing groups are invaluable resources, but family can also play a big role.

“My husband was forced to listen to me read it aloud,” Cannady jokes. “Sometimes he would read it aloud. And my son is also a writer, so he was very helpful, too.”

Cannady wrote Crave one page at a time, typing at least one page every day. Sometimes she wrote more, but she would not allow herself to go about her business without finishing her daily session. This morning ritual allowed her to have a life outside writing, while not allowing herself to procrastinate or become upset for not writing enough.

According to Cannady, a revision is a major undertaking. She says she used to do simple line editing, but that isn’t enough to prepare a manuscript for publication.

“Once I learned that [line editing] was a waste of time early in the process, I started thinking more holistically about the different chapters that I was working on. What message was I trying to convey with that particular section or scene or chapter? When I started thinking about it that way, I wasn’t looking for what needed to go; I was looking for what I could keep.”

Cannady made major changes during this revision process. Sometimes only a few sentences out of a 30-page chapter would remain in the next draft. She says she searches for the heart of the piece. Her routine of writing one page a day may produce plenty of material she’ll never use, but Cannady finds gems within the work.

“I look for those lines that string together, that allow me to see the whole piece a little better,” she says.

This selectivity allows Cannady to feel removed from the pressure of making every one of her sentences perfect as she writes. Once she finds the heart of the piece, Cannady re-writes the entire section.

As an example, Cannady describes her experience in reviewing one of the chapters in Crave, entitled “Never Tell.” She says she was distraught when she began revising.

“I had written most of that chapter in a stream of consciousness, but some of it just didn’t make sense. There was so much that I wanted to include, but it was just a big mess.”

When Cannady looked at the chapter again, she realized it read like a biography, chronicling each day of her relationship with a man named Sanford. Readers of memoirs don’t want to read objective biographies, Cannady says. Memoir, in her view, goes beyond biography, attempting to make sense of the past and letting the reader access deeper truths.

“The way I had written Sanford initially was very harsh because he had been harsh to me,” Cannady says. “But, of course, that wasn’t all of who he was. He was very funny. He was very likeable. No one would have believed that he was battering me behind closed doors because he kept up the façade of this perfect young man.”

Cannady says if she just retold the story as it happened to her, the reader wouldn’t have learned anything about abusive relationships. But when Cannady puts Sanford onstage in a theater production, in the same way that she originally saw him, she was able to convey more of who he was. One scene was worth more than dozens of pages about their relationship.

“When I first wrote his part, he was just a monster. And the reader would say, ‘why would you date this monster?’ But when I allowed the reader to be introduced to the way that I was introduced to him, when I allowed the reader to see him in the way that others saw him, and even in the way that he saw himself, I felt like he came to life for me, and even I understood him better.”

Sanford is emblematic of the young men who dated Cannady and tried to help her, but made things worse because they, themselves, were so broken.

Cannady says the biggest obstacle she faced was feeling that she had the right to tell not only her story, but also the stories of the others in her book.

“My story is so intertwined with so many other people,” she says. “I’d be writing about someone and think, ‘oh, this person’s not gonna like this.’ I spent a lot of time thinking about how it might affect other people. And that was the stumbling block that not only affected me during the writing process, but during the revision process, and even during the process of sending my manuscript out.”

Cannady deliberated for a long time.

“I sat on the manuscript for over a year,” she says. “Because of the doubts, because of the fear.”

Cannady says she worried about how people would receive the book, including her family. But ultimately, she made the bold decision to share her story.

“You have to own your story and understand that it’s yours to tell. You have a right to tell it.”

Fears are usually overblown, she says.

“Most of the people that you write about won’t even read it,” Cannady says, “and even if they do read it, no matter what you wrote, they’re probably gonna say, ‘that’s not how it happened.’ Even if it’s something great.”

Cannady once read her mother a scene between the two. It was an emotionally charged scene that showed a connection between mother and daughter. Cannady thought her mother would enjoy being portrayed in a favorable light. When Cannady finished reading the piece, her mom’s response was unexpected.

“I didn’t make French fries that day,” her mother said. “They were potato logs.”

Everyone has a different version of the truth and will remember different things, Cannady says. While she was focused on the emotional content of the scene, her mother was focused on the potatoes.

“For memoirists, the people that are in the book are real people. They’re not just characters,” Cannady says. “But you have to write them as if they are a character. You have to look at them for all of their layers. You have to investigate who they are to you, but also how they may see themselves in the world, and how others may see them.”

Cannady says she learned a lot about this process in presenting her version of events.

“What I learned was that there were parts of my story that my mother had to protect herself from,” she says. “There were parts of my story that my sister and my brothers had to protect themselves from. When they said, ‘that’s not the way it happened,’ I couldn’t take it personally. I had to say, ‘okay, well that’s the way it happened for me.’”

Once Cannady accepted that her writing would never totally please everyone else, she focused on making herself happy with her work. In so doing, Cannady says she became stronger. Writing Crave allowed her to discover a lot about herself.

“I learned a lot about who I was as a young girl, but I also learned a lot about what I was still carrying—the things that I thought I had put down, but that they were still with me, and they were very, very heavy. Writing actually allowed me to put some of that luggage down and to pick up new things.”

Cannady’s rejuvenated confidence helped her analyze decisions she made and the ways she interacted with people.

“It was definitely an awakening I can pass on to my children, and hopefully to the reader,” Cannady says.

SMALL PRESS. BIG OPPORTUNITY.

Interested in publishing? Want to see what working for a small press is all about? We may have just the opportunity for you. Etruscan Press offers a variety of internships to help you acquire valuable skills and credentials while learning the publishing world from the inside.

DESIGN AND EDITING
Design covers and internal text.

SOCIAL MEDIA
Research new networking opportunities, market through social media.

MARKETING
Work with authors to promote individual titles, arrange readings and book signings, interact with universities and libraries, research marketing niches, and work with bookstores and other potential venues for author appearances.

COMMUNITY OUTREACH
Explore opportunities to bring Etruscan books and authors to classrooms and other learning sites and develop accompanying educational materials.

GRANT AND PROMOTIONAL WRITING
Research new funding sources and help write grants to support new projects. Work on publication releases, as well as promotional copy for new books, website, and other venues.

WEBSITE DEVELOPMENT
Take on a variety of projects to enhance Etruscan’s virtual presence.

OUTREACH PROGRAM

The Etruscan Press Educational Outreach Program continues to pair acclaimed authors with underserved students in area high schools, working to increase the literacy of students and offering a general appreciation for the literary arts.

The program goals include the following:

• Expand cultural and literary awareness throughout Northeast Ohio and Northeast Pennsylvania

• Demonstrate a love of literature to young people

• Promote intercultural acceptance and understanding

• Prepare underserved students for success in college

• Plant Little Free Libraries, which aim to bring Youngstown and Wilkes-Barre communities together through music and literature

• Continue to build alliances with community business partners to promote literacy, the love of reading, and enrich local neighborhoods

Etruscan Press is proud of support received from

Kevin Oderman’s Cannot Stay: Essays on Travel has beguiled readers since its release in July. Editorial associate Sam Chiarelli interviewed Kevin about how he brought this collection of essays to life.

Q: What attracted you to travel writing?

Travel appealed to me. And in this I am nothing if not common. Then, traveling, suffering the many difficulties, I began to wonder what was calling me to travel. That wondering is the source of my desire to write about travel.

Perhaps at the core, traveling disrupts our sense of time. Our lives fall into routines, and although routines slow time in the moment, when we look back at all that sameness, memory finds little to hold to. So, in memory, routine shortens our lives. In Cannot Stay I have tried to register this disruption of time, but also the ways in which the new of travel disrupts what we take as given, what our culture says is just so. Travel even a little and our cultural certainties begin to feel smug.

Q: How do you develop a sense of journey for your reader?

I tried to evoke the experience of the long flight overseas in the introduction to Cannot Stay. Most of my essays are written in vignettes, sometimes narrative, often not, but the links between the vignettes generally are not narrative. I hope the sense of being there is stronger than the sense of getting there.

Q: What is the writing process like for you, turning experiences into essays?

Experience is so chaotic, and traveling—the strangeness of the new place—makes it more so. So I try not to write too soon after a trip. I count on memory (or is it forgetting?) to sift through my experiences. I let memory be my first editor. I’m not at all confident that I can recognize what will stick with me in the flux of lived experience. Often images will rise out of memory with the force of dream, or myth, sometimes things I hardly noticed at the time. I like to work with these memories, the ones that stick and are perhaps burnished by being lifted out of their original context.

Then I’m finding patterns, making meaning. During the actual composition, this is most like listening. The material comes to me, accretes around a few images or relations or ideas. It grows. Then it’s all about shaping, structure, getting the language right.

Q: You said memory is like an editor for you. Can you expand a little more on how memory affects your work?

Often memory works by association, one memory calling up another, related memory. And it feels like there is already a pattern there to discover. Of course, the mind is busy and much of memory is random; it’s like listening to a song on the radio through a lot of static. Sometimes the song comes clear and possesses you.

Sometimes it doesn’t. For instance, I have been haunted for years—almost twenty years—by a memory that has never found a place in a pattern of memories. Here it is: I was living in Pakistan, in Lahore. I was on the way home from a party. I had a car and a driver and I had dropped a friend off at home and headed out into surprisingly heavy traffic. It was around midnight. Stop and go. Six lanes. We came up alongside a trailer loaded with I-beams, which was being pulled by another trailer loaded the same. Light glaring on all that steel piled high up over our little yellow car. Then our lane opened up and we slipped forward. I was almost asleep and then astonished to see that the trailers were hitched to a wooden cart. A man in a white shalwar kamis stood in the cart sending his whip—I think he had a whip—over the six camels in harness that were pulling all that steel. Something about how the camels leaned into the weight of it, the traffic, the glaring light. Bright as hallucination, indelible. I’ve revisited that moment, or, better, it has visited me, untold times since that night. Far more often than anything else that happened to me during the many months I lived in Lahore. But it never wanted to connect to anything else and I never found a use for it. Well, not until now.

DONATE TO ETRUSCAN PRESS

Etruscan Press is a 501c3 nonprofit organization and can exist only through the support of readers like you — those interested in sustaining the work of independent presses publishing quality literature. We ask you to join and support our mission.

“I hear America singing, her varied carols I hear.”

--Walt Whitman

Nothing attested, everything sung, writes Etruscan poet H. L. Hix, echoing Walt. Since our first release, September 11, 2001: American Writers Respond, Etruscan writers have sung a resonant chorus of poetry, fiction, creative nonfiction, and literary criticism.

People have taken notice. Three of our 62 titles have been finalists for the National Book Award. Etruscan books have won honors from the Poetry Society of America and ForeWord Magazine. We’ve been in Best American Poetry and on Garrison Keillor’s show. We’ve partnered with The National Endowment for the Arts, Wilkes University, and Youngstown State University. Our Educational Outreach Program brings new literature to thousands of at-risk students.

We ask you to join Etruscan’s varied carols. Help us continue to show what an independent, nonprofit literary press can do: orchestrate the literary music of authors not often heard in the mainstream. Help us show that books matter because they sing, not because of a bottom line.

Come join our swelling chorus. Please make a tax-deductible contribution today.
